Telepathy

Paul Solomon Reading # 0100.

Q-2. How can I attune myself to other people's feelings and also communicate with them mentally?

A-2. First of all, considering in this manner: If there would be the discipline daily with another person equally interested in the attuning or the communicating mentally, or telepathically, these disciplines may be developed by setting aside a period of time daily when there would be the practice in writing down what the other is doing. That is, each would become still, and quiet, and write his impressions of the other and what he is doing.

Now realize that it is the receiver that demonstrates the greater development rather than the sender. That is, there need not be made a positive effort to send a message to another. The ability is in the reception. This, then, should teach a great principal: The great principal of telepathy is love. That is, one cannot communicate telepathically with another human being without caring for the thoughts, the feelings of that human being. There must be then developed the understanding of others, the need to attune to others, the caring, the concern for another's thoughts. How would you receive that which you do not care to receive, that which you would not attune to? There must first, then, be developed the love, the rapport, the respect for another's thoughts, and the desire to receive and understand the thoughts of another. Would you not become one through such relationship?

Seek, then, that all develop this on this plane for it is given of God as the purest means of communication, and as there is the ability to receive one another's thoughts, would you not become tuned together as a group? Would you not love one another more? Would you not function in harmony for knowing the likes, the dislikes? There would never be the possibility of hurting another on inner planes for there would be the understanding of the emotional conflict within one another. There would be the perfect attunement, one with the other, the perfect harmony in producing the perfect music, of an organization working together for common good. See, then, that you develop within. In attuning yourselves one with the other, you will understand the laws of mental projection, mental telepathy
