

Relationships

Relationships, Homosexuality

Paul Solomon Reading 0189. June. 1973

There is no one single purpose that soul choose to enter as homosexuals. There are many different directions and lessons they may experience. However, an overall purpose for every one of them is the desire to develop the ability to love, to give and to serve. That same purpose, however, probably can be said to be a goal of every soul that enters the School of Earth.

Question: Why am I homosexual in this life, and how should I best handle my homosexuality?

Answer: Now understand the self in this way, for even in the asking of the question it is shown the lack of understanding, for you are not homosexual. But understand in this way.

This soul has come many times, in many sojourns upon this earth. And in the handling of this or that problem, there would be taken this or the manner for dealing, for coping, for developing that which it would seek to accomplish. Then understand such purpose as well in the looking upon another, in dealing with, in attempting to cope with the problems of homosexuality. So this one did look upon another and say, "It would be so easy to overcome. I see that I would be able to adjust in such a way, in this way or that, and I would be able to live above, to rise above, to control."

So was there condemning of another. Even in those early times, in the seeing of these problems, then in such an action was there the asking within the self for the same to manifest. Understand as well if there would be the controlling of emotions, if there would be the overcoming of desire, then there would be set within the self those tools the soul would need to overcome. Would be as signal to the self to disregard, to do without, to overcome the challenge in this time.

Then if one would seek in the development in those times of the giving up, of depriving self of this or that, or the remolding of the physical, of the mental, of the mind, of subjecting the self to the service of the Christ, then there would be taken that which would be condemned within the self and society. Then this one, thinking on inner planes, "If I would take upon myself that that would be condemned by society or by those about, then this would be the reminder to self that this is the problem on which I would work in this time. This would be that major hurdle that I would overcome." Then see the homosexuality, or the sex within itself not as a problem, not as a challenge, not as a condition, but these set as opportunities, as reminders, constantly causing the soul to feel. "This is what I came to work upon."

And never is there any indication stronger within the human than that of homosexuality, for there is the reminder from early times, from that first time of the realization, there is this feeling that, "I am different. I am set upon this plane with a special problem. I am alone. I am not a part." So is there the greater condition than any other man on this plane would cope with. And if there be the greater condition then there be also the greater strength. Then understand that these are highly evolved souls coping with such problems, and those who attempt to cope would do so with great strength. And those who overcome then, would they not have overcome more than have those others, or than that which is called the normal or ordinary, those feelings that agree with that polarity of the physical?

© 2007 The Paul Solomon Foundation